SUMMARY

PhD student in Sociology and Methodology of Social Research at the University of Milan. BA and MA in Sociology from the Pontifical Catholic University of Chile. I hold experience in public institutions, research centers and universities, in data analysis, research methodologies and public policy analysis. Recently, I have worked as an undergraduate professor, teaching sociological theory and quantitative methods, and as a socioeconomic analyst at the National Statistics Institute of Chile. I stand out for having a balance between theoretical and methodological skills, a great facility to work individually and collaboratively, the ability to adapt to new work and educational environments, an interest in the constant acquisition of new knowledge, responsibility, respect and work ethic. My main research interests are distributive justice; social stratification; economic sociology; quantitative research methods; and international comparative research.
